Price began her career as a teacher in the Rochester public schools. In 1897, she was appointed principal of Rochester's School for Girls. Price held this position for 27 years, and during that time she transformed the school into one of the leading educational institutions for women in the country. Under Price's leadership, the school's curriculum was expanded to include courses in science, mathematics, and the arts. Price also established a strong physical education program at the school, and she encouraged her students to participate in sports and other extracurricular activities.

In addition to her work as a teacher and administrator, Price was also an active advocate for women's rights. She was a member of the National American Woman Suffrage Association, and she worked to promote the passage of the 19th Amendment, which gave women the right to vote. Price also served as president of the National Council of Women, and she represented the United States at several international conferences on women's rights.

Price's work had a lasting impact on American education and women's rights. She was a visionary leader who fought to improve the lives of young women and girls. Price's legacy continues to inspire educators and activists today.

Early Life and Education

Alice Lindsay Price was born on June 6, 1864, in Rochester, New York. She was the daughter of Daniel Price, a successful businessman, and Sarah Lindsay Price, a devoted mother and homemaker. Price had a happy childhood, and she was surrounded by a loving family. She was a bright and curious child, and she excelled in school. Price attended the Rochester Female Academy, and she graduated with honors in 1882.

After graduating from high school, Price attended the University of Michigan. She was one of the few women enrolled in the university at that time, and she was determined to prove that women could be just as successful as men in higher education. Price studied classical languages, history, and philosophy. She graduated from Michigan in 1886 with a Bachelor of Arts degree.
