After the Civil War, Logue attended Berea College, one of the few schools in the South that admitted African American students. He graduated from Berea in 1874 with a degree in theology. Logue's education at Berea was transformative, and it gave him the tools and knowledge he needed to become a leader in his community.

Civil Rights Activism

After graduating from Berea, Logue returned to Scott County and became involved in the civil rights movement. He was a founding member of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) in Kentucky, and he worked tirelessly to fight for the rights of African Americans. In 1882, Logue led a group of African American farmers in Scott County in a protest against the unfair treatment they were receiving from white landowners. The protest was successful, and it helped to raise awareness of the plight of African American farmers in Kentucky. Logue's activism continued throughout his life, and he remained a vocal advocate for civil rights until his death in 1923.

Education and Social Justice

In addition to his civil rights activism, Logue was also a dedicated educator and social justice advocate. He believed that education was the key to empowering African Americans and to breaking down the barriers of racism. Logue taught at several schools in Kentucky, and he also founded the Logue Industrial School in Frankfort in 1893. The Logue Industrial School provided vocational training and other educational opportunities for African American students.

Logue also worked to improve the lives of African Americans in other ways. He helped to establish the Kentucky Colored Orphans Home in Frankfort, and he was a strong advocate for health care and other social services for African Americans. Logue's work helped to make Kentucky a better place for all of its citizens.
